A HAPPY GERMAN PRINCE

The German emperor's rage at the morganatic marriage of his son Oscar will probably be merely Pickwickian. Such unions, if they are with good women of aristocratic lineage (as in this case), often increase the popularity of a reigning house; and the heads of the house know this quite as well as any one else.

If the kaiser were choosing one of his offspring to be immolated on the altar of Cupid for the good of his imperial house, he could not make a better choice than that of Prince Oscar, for there are nine lives between this prince and the throne, and the young man is a good "mixer."

But, of course, the show of opposition must be kept up, in order that the world may be impressed with the awfulness of the thought of the marriage of a Hohenzollern with a mere countess. After the public has been sufficiently impressed, the kaiser will probably acquiesce in the union.

A more serious matter in German affairs is the protest which the Prussian government has just made, in
